Yellow Vests Movement in France: The Big Fear is that the Working Class Will Move

The “Yellow Vests” movement started in France at the end of October. The protest was largely motivated by social anger over fuel prices, particularly due to the increase in the tax on petroleum products. But the protests have gradually broadened into a mobilization against the whole of the government’s policies of the last two years, of which the most important are the environmental tax on pollution caused by the automobile industry, and the increase in the prices of gasoil by 15% for the petrol stations, which is in addition to the tax on petroleum products. The government is unable to understand why the mobilization continues, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the government’s decision to take a show of strength through the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

On the other hand, the government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement in the coming months, and the problem has been amplified by the announcement of a blockade on the national roads throughout France. The government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement, calling for a mobilization on social media, calling for a “mobilization” on Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris. The government announced a blockade on the national roads, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

France is spontaneous and was born out of the capitalist mode of production. To depend simply on the goodwill or solidarity of the rest of the world is beyond the control of even the most amorphous “popular” mass. It is not an organization of Italian workers, but not as a vanguard, but as a movement that is increasingly divided.

The “Yellow Vests” movement started in France at the end of October. The protest was largely motivated by social anger over fuel prices, particularly due to the increase in the tax on petroleum products. But the protests have gradually broadened into a mobilization against the whole of the government’s policies of the last two years, of which the most important are the environmental tax on pollution caused by the automobile industry, and the increase in the prices of gasoil by 15% for the petrol stations, which is in addition to the tax on petroleum products. The government is unable to understand why the mobilization continues, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the government’s decision to take a show of strength through the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

On the other hand, the government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement in the coming months, and the problem has been amplified by the announcement of a blockade on the national roads throughout France. The government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement, calling for a mobilization on social media, calling for a “mobilization” on Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris. The government announced a blockade on the national roads, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

France is spontaneous and was born out of the capitalist mode of production. To depend simply on the goodwill or solidarity of the rest of the world is beyond the control of even the most amorphous “popular” mass. It is not an organization of Italian workers, but not as a vanguard, but as a movement that is increasingly divided.

The “Yellow Vests” movement started in France at the end of October. The protest was largely motivated by social anger over fuel prices, particularly due to the increase in the tax on petroleum products. But the protests have gradually broadened into a mobilization against the whole of the government’s policies of the last two years, of which the most important are the environmental tax on pollution caused by the automobile industry, and the increase in the prices of gasoil by 15% for the petrol stations, which is in addition to the tax on petroleum products. The government is unable to understand why the mobilization continues, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the government’s decision to take a show of strength through the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

On the other hand, the government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement in the coming months, and the problem has been amplified by the announcement of a blockade on the national roads throughout France. The government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement, calling for a mobilization on social media, calling for a “mobilization” on Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris. The government announced a blockade on the national roads, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

France is spontaneous and was born out of the capitalist mode of production. To depend simply on the goodwill or solidarity of the rest of the world is beyond the control of even the most amorphous “popular” mass. It is not an organization of Italian workers, but not as a vanguard, but as a movement that is increasingly divided.

The “Yellow Vests” movement started in France at the end of October. The protest was largely motivated by social anger over fuel prices, particularly due to the increase in the tax on petroleum products. But the protests have gradually broadened into a mobilization against the whole of the government’s policies of the last two years, of which the most important are the environmental tax on pollution caused by the automobile industry, and the increase in the prices of gasoil by 15% for the petrol stations, which is in addition to the tax on petroleum products. The government is unable to understand why the mobilization continues, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the government’s decision to take a show of strength through the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.

On the other hand, the government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement in the coming months, and the problem has been amplified by the announcement of a blockade on the national roads throughout France. The government launched a campaign to fight the Yellow Vests movement, calling for a mobilization on social media, calling for a “mobilization” on Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris. The government announced a blockade on the national roads, which occurred Saturday, December 1, along with the deployment of the national police, the gendarmerie and the army to the place de la Concorde in Paris.
For the Clas...