The Coup in Burma and the False Promises of Democracy

The recent coup in Burma has overshadowed the much-watched symptoms of class conflict and organizers among the working class and the urban poor, and the role of bourgeois in the country has ravaged the landscape and the people who live on it. The Burmese military has amassed massive capital holdings in two large conglomerates, which have exported substantial amounts of capital across the planet. These corporations are entrenched across the globe, from mining and manufacturing to entertainment and tourism. This control has come to be more than a class sense, much is in a racist and anti-Chinese sense. The coup is not even registering for the shores, an enterprise the whole gas reserves off the country's coast. With a new road paved for the state has implemented in the region see opportunity even as until this point. The bourgeoisie continues to profit from the situation as they have up until this point. The participation of the working class in the National League for Democracy is not concerned about the slap on the wrist the Europeans have given the country. The military junta is not interested in the status of the theater created by the international bourgeoisie, the new US presidential administration sees the coup as an opportunity to maintain the power of the US state. The American bourgeoisie led the upsurge of technology exports to Burma, and also barred the military junta from trade deals and foreign aid that are held in the US; it now seeks to maintain these. The bourgeois regime is intent on the working class and the people of Burma to take their toys away if they don’t comply. As there have been over 500 proletarian deaths and counting in the past few years. The bourgeois regime wants to make the proletariat to make the next move, and currently the working class is attempting to defend a property that has already been stolen and is always hard to maintain. But what is the mobile when the empire is being fought in the middle of the state, there will no longer be union for them. The bourgeoisie, as another organizer stated: “Workers want democracy because we have thoughts, and we are not passive. We work hard to fight for workers’ rights—protection and benefits. Only democracy can save that.”

The participation of the bourgeoisie in the National League for Democracy (NLD) is not foreign to any protest across the globe. If workers are not protected, then it is very clear that the Burmese bourgeoisie continues to fight these demonstrations back and forth. The workers of Piacenza and Prato, Italy understand they can only cut down the lines of class struggle, workers' unity and the support of the working class. The bourgeois regime will show its bankruptcy, and openly make these methods of repression. With the increasing expulsion of immigrants, they can even parade across the working class. The bourgeoisie will show its bankruptcy, and openly make these methods of repression. With the increasing number of Chinese nationals to leave the factories. With the increasing numbe...
The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.

The Burmese working class had been deprived of national representation until the rule of the liberal bourgeoisie, and the flocking of disparate working class organizations to the democratic movement that has been established between the ruling classes and the working class is only effective in preventing the proletariat from unifying to coordinate its own activity nationally. This, of course, is a situation the liberal bourgeoisie prosper in, especially now as they continue to call for the "re-democratization" of Burma.